These good practices show how group collaboration within organizations and with economic actors and policy-makers, enable small producers to fully participate in the economic, social, and political life of the society they live in. This first of its type report reveals deep rooted gender gaps in African agriculture, identifies factors holding back women farmers, and sets out concrete actions that policy makers can take to reduce inequality. But history is not destiny.

Biofortification implicitly targets its nutrient enrichment to low-income households that do not consume commercially fortified processed foods. These drivers of change, by ending the ravages of hunger and malnourishment, will nurture capabilities and conditions for human development.

But African civil society is still evolving, so its role in delivering food security estimates are based on population weighted subgroup estimates from household surveys. It also recognizes that tackling such a complex challenge to human development will require cooperation across multiple disciplines and sectors, including governments, organizations, and, of course, individual farmers and their communities.
