The social representation of immigrants: the Pantanella issue in the pages of... These perspectives provide different answers to the question of how and why, as research consistently shows, news on migrants is so often negative and so often about crime. All of them are characterised by a wider perspective, which inscribes empirical findings in a historical, socio-economic, and political perspective. Research within the discourse analytical tradition has indicated that media coverage does shape the way that people speak and think about immigrants. Another problem concerning electronic data regards the graphic format and a checklist may contain the following levels and elements of analysis: [57].
